

A close to perfect trip back

The day of our journey back was, what we call a typical British weather day. A mix of cloudy, windy and sunny, but luckily no rain. We started the day with a guided tour at the Globe, where we had gone to see Romeo and Juliet the day before. After that we still had time to take a stroll through Spitalfields market. With our head full of multicultural and culinary impressions we headed afterwards straight to our hostel. First thing to do was to collect our suitcases at the hostel. Simon Häfliger was already expecting us there, as he hadn't been in a position to join us in the morning (let's just say he wasn't feeling well). When we were supposed to leave the hostel we got informed that Lilith, Marielle and Fabienne had planned to stay in London for the Weekend, which meant they wouldn't join us for the journey back. I think I wasn't the only one who was a bit jealous. So everyone else took the tube from Paddington to Kings Cross St. Pancras. Unluckily not everyone arrived there. While we were in the tube, Mrs Eckert got a phone call. The Hostel informed her that Ayça had left her wallet there. So Mrs Scheuble and Ayça hurried back to the Hostel to get it. Meanwhile we took their suitcases and waited at St. Pancras station for them to get back. Some of us took the chance to return the Oystercards, while others decided to keep them for the next trip to London. When Ayça and Mrs. Scheuble got back with the wallet we all got on the train to Gatwick Airport on time.

At Kings Cross St. Pancras trainstation

At the Airport everyone had to check in their luggage on their own, using machines. But nobody had a problem with that. We then all had time to eat dinner and relax, what was nice because we were all really tired, especially the boys. They had not got much sleep the last night and we had had a long exciting day.

When it was time to get on the plane it took a while until everyone was sitting on their preferred seat.

Then the plane took off and most of us took the chance to get some sleep. The flight was quick and soon we landed in Switzerland. Mrs Eckert had her good bye speech and then the class was dismissed from an amazing trip to London.