

Food you should not miss!

London is known for its huge food diversity. There are a lot of different restaurants. As a tourist, you can eat everyday something different. There are for example a lot of Asian or Italian restaurants. But this is just one part of this extensive offer. Another important part of London food are the numerous markets. I've decided to visit some of these markets and to describe and write about them and find out in what way they are different. Go on for results.

First, I visited Camden Market in Camden town. We reached this market by a canal with a boat, we've done a boat tour to Camden town with the whole class. After this trip, we could explore the market by ourselves. Camden Market has two main parts; food and stuff like clothes or souvenirs. The food part was impressive. There were a lot of people and different noises and then the delicious smells. This mix of all the impressions leaves a notion. We walked around the stands. The cooks offered to try their food. Most stands had a prepared meal to show the nice food you could eat there. Kind of a presentation. So, after trying out a lot of delicious snacks, I've decided to taste a "East London Classic" burger. It was spicy. Didn't notice that before I've bought it.

Ghetto Grillz-Stand bei Camden Market

Camden Market von oben

The second market was the Borough market. I was there for 2 times. First alone with a friend, then with the whole class. Borough market is different to Camden market. It's not as loud as the Camden one and it doesn't smell like food everywhere. Except near the seafood part. Borough market is more like a place where you can buy things like meat, cheese or wine. It's not fast food to take away. There are stands like the described one, but not so many. But next to the Borough market, there is the Green market. There you can buy a lot of different food, alike Camden Market. Never had had such good salami. Recommendation! The second time I went there I bought a "Barbeque Chicken" Wrap. The best food I had in London. The Wrap was fresh and got some good ingredients.

Borough Market from top

Seafood-Stand (watch out for globefish)

Salami Green Market

«Barbeque Chicken» Wrap

On Friday, we went to Spital Field Market. In my opinion, this is the “smallest” Food market of all the ones I have been to. The “Stuff” Part of the Spital Field Market is much bigger than the food part. At Spital Field Market, there is African food and a lot of Asian food. It’s almost quiet there if you compare it to the other markets. I’ve decided to get my food at a sandwich stand. There was melted cheese in there and of course it was nice. Miss Eckert recommended it to us. I am glad she did.

Spital Field

Sandwich with melted cheese

I think these markets should be visited by everyone who travels to London. Camden and Green Market are nice to eat lunch, at Borough Market you can buy your presents for family and friends and at the Green Market you can eat nicely after shopping and wandering around the stands. My favorite was Camden Market because there you got the biggest diversity and its designed creatively. The cooks and the owners have always been friendly and offered us to try out new food. You shouldn’t miss this.